HERBERT BRANDL. EXPOSED TO PAINTING THE PAST TWENTY YEARS

January 31 to May 24, 2020

With his large-format pictorial worlds, Herbert Brandl is among the most successful Austrian painters of the present day. Belvedere 21 is paying tribute to his creation from the past twenty years, which is shaped by an examination of the diverse manifestations of nature.

"Herbert Brandl's strongly expressive painting is both romantic and visionary. The powerful gestures with which the artist captures mountains, rivers, and color fields on the canvas, always refer to the process of painting itself," says General Director Stella Rollig.

Unfazed by contemporary trends, Herbert Brandl's self-image as a painter was already solidified in a period in which painting had been declared dead, and disciplines such as conceptual art, performance, and media art dominated. As far back as his studies at the University of Applied Arts in Vienna under Herbert Tasquil and Peter Weibel beginning in 1978, the Styrian painter set off on a path toward a unique artistic position that is currently beyond dispute.

The natural motif dominates Brandl's oeuvre and appears in a variety of manifestations. With images that open the gaze to the monumental, as well as "zoom-ins" and "blow ups," he alternates between close-ups and distant views. Large mountain formations, imposing waterfalls, and atmospheric meadow landscapes stand side-by-side with intimate close-ups of bits of lawns and fields from the microcosm of his own garden. Brandl plays with expressive gestures, abstract color spaces, and mighty shaped structures. His art evolves in painting processes: rapidly, intuitively, with great physical effort, without a preplanned, targeted procedure. In the tension of figuration and abstraction, Brandl's works oscillate between a recognition of nature and sensual impressions of color and form. In his most recent works, Brandl largely leaves the concrete landscape behind, and turns his attention to the effects of pure color.

The exhibition at Belvedere 21 presents Brandl's pictorial oeuvre, with a focus on works from the past two decades including works that the artist created specifically for this exhibition. A monumental new work bears the ironic, pointed title Apokalypse zur schönen Aussicht. The triptych is flanked by ominous "post-apocalyptic" bronze creatures. Exposed to Painting displays that references to painting of the Romantic period are evident in Brandl's treatment of "nature" as a subject. In his landscape paintings, the artist shows a boundless, wild, simultaneously spectacular nature in the sense of the aesthetic category of the sublime. Brandl conceives of nature in its original form, that is, in the sense of organic and inorganic nature that has grown of its own accord, which arises and exists without any human intervention.

"At the level of the subject and also in the sentiment, overlaps can be observed consistently between the pictorial language of the Romantic period and Brandl's work," stipulates curator Rolf H. Johannsen. "Brandl's goal is not a recognition of nature oriented on reality, but instead, the recording of form, which can extend into the ideal, but also the heroic, starting points for Christoph Ransmayr in his literary texts on selected paintings, which are original, integral parts of the exhibition."

Nonetheless, Brandl's approach to nature is a contemporary one. The artist consciously deals with the environmental problems of the twenty-first century and also acts as a concerned, environmental protectionist. When, through his selection of motifs, he points to endangered natural areas, such as the Schwarze Sulm or the Koralpe in Styria, his artistic interest in nature attains a concrete political dimension. Brandl has dedicated numerous works to both of these landscapes. With this, he articulates a calm but clear appeal for the protection of nature—a gesture that couldn't be any more topical in times of advancing environmental destruction and climate change.
